Recognition and Crosslinks of Amyloid Fibrils by Amyloid-Specific Peptide Patterns. The formation and modification of amyloid fibrils are among the most important determinants of the development of neurodegenerative diseases. Several peptide motifs have been described to be specific for the amyloidogenic species, showing a high affinity to the amyloid fibrils. Most of these sequences were experimentally identified in amyloid aggregates. Here, we analyzed the potential of pre-existing peptide motifs to identify amyloid aggregates. We observed that a preferential recognition of a particular amyloid aggregate is not necessarily transferable to crosslinking with another peptide. We show that a set of amyloid-specific peptides displaying amyloid-relevant conformational properties does not necessarily crosslink all amyloid aggregates. Our data suggest that the motifs in preformed amyloid fibrils provide a specific pattern of amino acid residues which is responsible for the specific features of the crosslinks. We present two novel crosslinking peptides. The characteristic preference of certain crosslinks allows for a differentiation between different amyloid species. The set of amyloid-specific crosslinking peptides presented here provides an important tool for structural studies of amyloid aggregates and can potentially help to study and identify amyloid polymorphism. The invention relates to a jack-up platform for use in deep-water diving, comprising a jack-up mast mounted on a ship, at least one leg assembly provided to be able to be driven to and retracted from each mast, a pivot means for driving the leg assembly, a connection to a diving bell with a motor unit for raising and lowering the leg assembly, as well as a drive assembly for the jack-up mast, a starting energy storage unit, and an energy exchange means for the connection to a ship. The invention also relates to a jack-up mast provided for sinking in deep-sea diving. A jack-up platform of the type described above is known from patent SE 469 252. The patent describes an arrangement of this type comprising at least two legs, and at least one jack-up mast and the leg assembly for sinking
